The authors present an unusual presentation of a right-sided, intussusception secondary to a cecal volvulus. The combination of clinical, radiological, and operative findings has not been described previously. This case emphasizes that barium enema and abdominal CT scanning are essential for accurate preoperative diagnosis. In addition, the authors recommend that ileocolic resection be performed when a malignant lesion is demonstrated by these two modalities, even in the absence of peritoneal metastases.Q: How to check data in the table have a limit?
